Influence of Muslim Thought on the East

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Chapter LIX

INFLUENCE OF MUSLIM THOUGHT ON THE EAST

A INTRODUCTION

Gibbons describes the rise and expansion of Islam as one of the most memor- able revolutions which has impressed a new and lasting character on the nations of the world. Beginning with a following small, ill-equipped financially and militarily, Islam turned out eventually a mighty force, wielding its acquire of authority over a world greater than that of Alexander the Great, greater than that of Rome, and that too acquired in a very much shorter period. Hardly fifty years had passed since Prophet Muhammad was commissioned by God to spread His gospel of truth when the Muslims planted the banner of Islam on the confines of India on the one side, and on the shores of the Atlantic on the other. Islam began to spread after the migration (hijrah) of the Prophet from Mecca to Medina. Conversions took place on an unprecedented scale. The new ideology inspired the Arabs as no other ideology had done before; it filled their hearts with longings both mundane and supermundane and enabled them to accomplish in an incredibly short time what would have otherwise required centuries of well-planned and well-calculated strategy. The amazing success of the Arab nation was due not only to their organization, zeal, and aspiration, but also and in a large measure to the unifying action of Islam and the inspiring and revolutionary nature of its social programme and its ability to lead the masses out of the hopeless situation created by the decay of the antique civilizations of Greece, Rome, Persia, China, and India,1 and to the all-powerful influence of the Qur'an. None can deny the inherent faith of the early Muslims in the ultimate triumph of their cause, actuated as that faith was, not by the baser motives of power, but by the idea of establishing the Kingdom of God on earth.

In the opinion of Georges Rivière2 the objective of the Muslim conquests was the construction of a universal State which "recognized no distinctions of race, nor of social conditions, the only rule it insisted upon was equal justice and fraternity." Naturally, the physically suffering and morally disjoined masses found in Islam a promise of liberation and salvation.

To the place they conquered the Muslims carried not only the flag of Islam but also culture, philosophy, and the study of nature all of which had their source in the Qur'an and the Sunnah.

In what follows, an attempt will be made to trace the course of intellectual revolution which Muslim thought brought about in Persia, Turkey, China, India, and Indonesia.

B

PERSIA

Islam was introduced to the land of Persia in 7/628 by the Prophet Muhammad himself, when through an epistle addressed to Khusrav Parvíz, the then Persian monarch, he extended an invitation to him and his subjects to embrace Islam; to affirm the unity of God and the apostleship of Muhammad,

1 M. N. Roy, The Historical Role of Islam, Chaps. 1–3.

1390

Influence of Muslim Thought on the East
to do good and to refrain from evil. In olden times no king, much less a Persian potentate, would receive a direct communication from an unknown person without getting flared up, the act being regarded as an instance of insolence and sacrilege. Accordingly, the Prophet's letter was torn to pieces and his emissary expelled with ignominy and disgrace. On hearing this, the Prophet felt sad and prophesied an early downfall of Khusrav's Empire. It was during the rule of the first Calif that, as a response to this insult, the Muslim forces, under the leadership of General Sa'd, invaded Persia and inflicted a terrible defeat on the Persian army in the battle of Qadisyah. This battle served as a prelude to a series of defeats which the Persians suffered at the hands of the Arabs and which sealed their fate in a short period of ten years after the delivery of the Prophet's letter. King Yazdigid, a lad of eighteen, was probably the last ruler to make a futile attempt against the Muslims. His Chinese and Turkish mercenaries deserted him on the first onslaught of the Arabs, while he was himself plundered and assassinated by a villager in whose house he had taken refuge after fleeing from the battlefield.

In the first/seventh century the Persian Empire like the Byzantine Empire was tottering under the crushing weight of despotism. Persecutions born of religious dissensions were the order of the day. Zoroastrianism was the State religion and its priests, not content with the spiritual authority they enjoyed by virtue of their office, also held positions of trust and responsibility in the administration of the State. A campaign of vilification followed by persecutions started against the adherents of the older forms of religion in Persia, among which ranked Jews, Christians, Buddhists, Sabaeans, Gnostics, and Manicheans. All the older faiths and creeds longed to breathe freely and freshly in an atmosphere of toleration and comradship which they eventually found in the teachings of Islam. Not only was it enjoined by Islam that the Christians and Jews must be treated with fairness and consideration because of their being the "People of the Book," but according to the clear directions of the Prophet the Zoroastrians were also to be treated at par with them, and hence entitled to the same privileges and concessions as enjoyed by the Muslims. All that was required of the non-Muslims was payment of a nominal poll-tax for the security they enjoyed under the Muslim rule. In return they were exempted not only from the payment of zadd, the State tax which every Muslim had to pay, but also from military service. Those non-Muslims who entered the military service had not to pay the poll-tax.

The conquest of Persia by the Arabs brought relief to the Christians. Earlier, the Sassanid kings had fomented bitter struggles between the Jacobites and the Nestorians; they had also been persecuting the Christian sects within their domains because of the Christian aggression from abroad. King Khusrav II ordered a general persecution of the Christians as he had suffered a defeat at the hands of Heraclius, a Christian monarch. The masses also welcomed the new creed. The Zoroastrian priests held in contempt the working classes—artisans, mechanics, labourers, agriculturists—who defiled fire, earth, and water in pursuance of their trades and professions. The labouring classes in the Zoroastrian society had the same miserable lot as the Šudra in the caste-ridden Hindu society. In the new faith of the conquerors, the common man found a panacea to most of the social ills from which he had so terribly suffered. Islam recognizes no distinctions of caste and occupation; it gives no preference to one class of individuals over another save on the basis of merit; and advocates a theory of human brotherhood which transcends geographical and political limits.

1391

With the downfall of the Šásšānian dynasty, Zoroastrianism lost its powerful support. In the altered circumstances it found itself extremely difficult to hold its own against the contending forces competing for supremacy. "To its spiritual bankruptcy may be added the social confusion for which its priests were chiefly responsible. The Zoroastrian masses welcomed the new faith because of its liberalism, dynamism, and absence of parochialism. They were also drawn toward it because of the many similarities between their faith and the new one. Instead of Ahura Mazda and Ahriman, they found Allah and Ilia; they also got their angels and demons, their stories about the creation of man and his resurrection, about heaven and hell and about sundry things similar to those found in their own religion. Besides all this, they discovered that the ethics of Islam was not very different from theirs. Under the Muslim rule they began to enjoy a remarkable degree of toleration; their religious practices were respected and their fire-temples safeguarded.² Besides the causes enumerated above for the spread of Islam in Persia, mention may also be made of the marriage of Šahršūn, a daughter of Yazdigird—the last monarch of the Šásšānian dynasty—with Russin, the son of 'Ali. Consequently, in the descendants of Russin and Šahršūn, the Persians could see the heirs to their ancient kings. This also accounts to some extent for the rise of Iliaism as a separate sect in Persia and the devotion of the Persians to the 'Alids. Islam lost its alien character and appealed to the patriotic feelings of the average Persian, as he felt that, in addition to other advantages, he gained through the aforesaid marriage alliance a reassurance of his native values and traditions. Persia had a remarkable culture and a highly developed civilization many centuries before the advent of Islam. In olden times, she was the erudite of thoughts and beliefs which supplied religion and philosophy to Persians and non-Persians. She was also the centre of a mighty political organization, and her theories of statecraft and administration became a model to the Turks. The intellectual aspect of the pre-Muslim Persian culture was determined by the philosophies of Zoroaster, Mani, and Mazdak—more or less dualistic despite a tinge of monotheism. The pre-Šásšānian thought indicated a tendency towards monotheism, especially in Zoroaster, but the tendency became a dominant feature of Persian thought, almost an indubitable truth.

Influence of Muslim Thought on the East

only after the Muslim conquest. The dualism of Good and Evil yielded place to the dualism of God and matter.

The 'Abbāsī Caliphate provided the most congenial atmosphere to the development of philosophy. As a result of Muslim influence, the Persians became the leaders of thought. Among the names of the foremost Persian thinkers may be mentioned those of Ibn Miskawayh, Ibn Sīna, al-Qazwī, Fakhr al-Dīn Rūzī, Nasīr al-Dīn Ṭūsī, Mulla Šāhra. The encyclopedic, Ikhwan al-Safa, though not original in their contributions, are also worthy of mention. They had among them some good scholars like Zaid, son of Rūstak, Abu Sulaimān Muhammad of Bust, 'Ali of Zanjan, Abu Ahmad Bīrājānī and 'Afi.² Persian Sufism also contains some very great names such as Abu Sa'id Ibn al-Khayr, 'Atīr, Jahāl al-Dīn Rīmī, Sa'dī, Ḥafs, al-Jili, and Hāmi. From Persia, Islam spread to China, Turkey, Afghanistan, India, and Indonesia.

C

CHINA, TURKEY, AND AFGHANISTAN

Islam was carried over to China by Muslim merchants. It was firmly planted there by Arab troops who fought for Ta Tsung (139/756) and settled in China after the successful conclusion of the war. Arnold thinks that there is no direct evidence of any proselytizing activity on the part of the Muslims in China. The entire Muslim population of the land consists of the descendants of the immigrants from Arabia, Persia, Turkey, and other Muslim territories as a result of Mongol conquests.² The number of Muslims in China is estimated at about thirty million.² The Chinese Muslims have, however, identified themselves with the rest of their countrymen, in spite of their religious differences.

The Afghanis believe that they were invited to Islam by Khozāl bin Wulh in the first/seventh century. But the earliest record of their conversion to Islam dates from the reign of al-Māmūn (198-218/813-833) when a king of Kabul was converted to Islam. His successors, however, reverted to Buddhism. Afghanistan was won for Islam in 256/871 by Ya'qūb bin Laith, but Islamic ideas did not catch the imagination of the masses until after the conquest of the country by Subuktigin and Mahmud of Ghazna.

The invasion of Chinggis Khān on Muslim Asia is regarded as the greatest calamity that has ever fallen on the human race. Like the huge waves of a mighty cyclone, it swept over the lands of Bukhāra, Khaiva, Khurasān, and Russia. Not only did Chinggis Khān plunder whatever he laid his hands

² Arnold, op. cit., p. 207.

The Ottomans, Turks who replaced the Seljuk were no less ardent in furthering the cause of learning and literature. It is said about 'Ughânán that as he lay on his death-bed, he advised his sons to "promote the learned to honour... and whatsoever place thou hearest of a learned man, let honour, magnificence, and clemency attend him."

Ottoman literature is very extensive, comprising every species of letters then current. Among the earlier poets may be mentioned Shâhî, Shâhî, Mir 'Ali Shir Nâwî, Ahmad Pâsha, Najâtî, Dâtî, Zâinâb, Mîhir, and ibn Kânâlâ. They wrote lyrics, and also thoughtful poems explaining the knotty problems of life through allegories and stories of animals and birds. Among the later poets who give evidence of greater poise and balance may be mentioned Fudžî, Bahâ, Nîfî, Nâbî, and Nâdîm. They introduced new strains and new modes of thinking in poetry. Among the prose writers, the names of 'Ali Châlâtî, Avlîya Efendi, Kâtîb Châlâtî may be mentioned. They wrote on history, chronology, geography, travels, and other subjects.¹⁰

All this shows that, like other Muslim countries, Turkey espoused the cause of learning and literature. The incentive was, however, provided by the religion of Islam, which the Turks had finally accepted.

D

INDIA

The impact of Islam on Hinduism is a phenomenon of remarkable significance. It is regretted that the Western writers as well as those of India (with the sole exception of Dr. Tara Chand) have in their works either ignored this fact altogether or assigned it an insignificant place in the history of Indian thought. In this section, it is intended to bring out the extent and significance of these ideas and beliefs which had their source in Muslim philosophy and religion and which in course of time, through personal contacts, religious disputations, discussions, and exchange of views, coloured and changed to a very substantial degree the complexion of Hindu thought and gave it a new orientation and direction.

There is no denying the fact that the Muslims were also influenced by Hinduism in some very important respects. They borrowed from the Hindus some aspects of mysticism and some mores, especially their caste-system, funeral and birth rites, marriage customs, untouchability which they practised against sweepers, and a host of other things—good and bad—which it is needless to enumerate. But the main tenets of the Hindu creed had no influence on Muslim ideology and code of life. No Muslim thinker of any importance has ever accepted the doctrines of transmigration, incarnation, karma, and polytheism in any shape or form, and these doctrines constitute the very soul and spirit of Hinduism. On the contrary, monothetic ideas of the Muslims together with their belief in the universal brotherhood of mankind were adopted by the Hindus which they bandied about as of Hindu origin. Indian philosophy after the first/seventh century has eroded konic interest in monothetic and castless society; it has also laid less emphasis on ritualism and negativism in life. This change may be due to several sociological and technological forces among which the advent of Islam in India must be ranked as a major factor of great cultural and philosophical importance. In the event of two cultures meeting together the dominant one pushes the weaker one to the periphery and occupies the centre itself. Something of the same sort happened in the case of Hindu culture and beliefs. In the ideological struggle which caused Muslim infiltration into India, the native culture, finding itself unequal to the incoming one, had to relinquish the central position. In what follows an attempt will be made to explain very briefly this remarkable phenomenon. After a short historical survey of the cultural contact, Muslim influence will be traced first up to Śaṅkarā, then from Śaṅkarā to Rāmānuja, and finally from Rāmānuja down to the present times.

¹⁰ Lord Kersville, The Turkish Empire, Lahore, 1937, p. 9.

A History of Muslim Philosophy

Cultural Contact.—The impact of Islam on Indian culture, thought, and religion was felt as early as the second/ninth century if not earlier. The writings of Muslim historians and travellers show that it was a South India, on the Malabar Coast, that the Muslims who were often preachers of their faith first settled as traders. Akbar Shāh Khān's reports of the tomb of a Companion of the Prophet, named Tāmmīn Amlak at Mylapur, twelve miles south of Madras. Islam also penetrated Ceylon. Ibn Battūṭah found the tombs of several preachers and saints in Ceylon during his travels. He mentions the names of Shāhi 'Abd Allāh Hanīfī, Shāhīd Utkūmī, and Bīka Tāhir among others.

Historical evidence proves unmistakably that the first Arab fleet appeared on Indian waters in 750/86 and was repulsed. But about the end of the first/seventh century, says Bawlinson, the Muslim Arabs settled in the Malabar Coast, and this fact is corroborated by Francis Day in his Land of the Permac, and by Sturrock in his South Kanara and Madras Districts Manuals. Humayun Karker writes, "Times, in his Malabar and Anjappad District Gazetteer, quotes an inscription of a tomb from Kollem of one Ali who died there in 166/76. Further circumstantial evidence is offered by the revolt in 141/ 756 of a colony of Muslims established at Canton in China. It is obvious that this colony could not have been founded without intermediate stations, of which the Malabar Coast was likely to be one. Caldwell picked up near Kayalapattan in Timevelly, near the mouth of the Tamraparani, a number of Arab coins bearing dates from 71/960. 1111

Muhammad bin Qasim invaded Sind in 94/12. The expedition was despatched by 'Abū Bakr, the viceroy of Iraq and Iran of the Umayyad dynasty. As a result of the conquest of Sind, Islam came to exercise a potent influence on Indian thought and culture. Part of India remained the Far Eastern territory of the Caliphate till 267/880 when the Caliphate began to decline. The kingdom of Ghaznah founded by Subuktigin who conquered Peshawar in 380/990 was a direct result of the weakening of the Caliphate. The aggressive policy of Subuktigin was followed by his ambitious and energetic son Mahmūd and by a series of Mughul, Tarar, Khurāsānī, and Afghan leaders. It was never the intention of the Muslim invaders to spread or work for their religion. A large number of the natives were converted to Islam not because of the political domination of the Muslims but for other reasons, among which may be ranked the missionary activities of the Sufi thinkers and the intolerable economic condition of the masses coupled with the ignorance of their own religion. The most important cause of the conversion was, however, the simplicity of the Islamic doctrine: the brotherhood it proclaims, and the equal status it accords to Śūdras and non-Śūdras alike. Even at the early stages the influence was so great that Dr. T.itus mentions eleven out of the several Hindu sects in which a definite mixture of Hindu and Muslim notions and practices prevailed. 12 A. N. Kirkbride admits monotheism and democratic spirit of Islam as potent factors in the evolution of religious-philosophic culture in India and traces in the strictly monotheistic doctrines of Nānak the influence of Islam. 13 It has been observed that Sind formed an outlying province of the Caliphate till 267/880. During this period and particularly during the reigns of al-Mansūr, al-Hārūn, and al-Māmūn attempts were made to understand Indian thought. From Sind, Hindu pandits came to the Court of al-Mansūr and presented to him Brhamasiddhānta and Kandabhanḍyak, famous astronomical andheels of Brahma- gupta. Both of these were translated into Arabic. A great impetus to this cultural understanding was afforded by the ministerial family of the Barnakids, who were patrons of Hindu learning in the Court of Hārūn al-Rāshīd. According to al-Birūnī, this family came from Bālghr where an ancestor of theirs was an official in a Buddhist temple. Arab scholars were sent by this family to India to study Indian thought, while Indian scholars were invited to the Court of Bāghdād to explain Hindu learning. In the fifth/eleventh century al-Muwaffiq and al-Birūnī visited India with the object of understanding Indian medicine, astronomy, and philosophy. Al-Birūnī was the first to translate Śūdrakā of Kapila into Arabic. He also translated BhojŚatra via Patanjali and introduced BhogaŚūtra to the Muslims.

The Hindus also evinced eagerness for understanding Muslim religion and thought. Baidhuri writes in the Pāṭaḥ al-Balādūd that during the reign of Hārūn al-Rāshīd, a Hindu rājā requested the Caliph to send a scholar to him to expound and discuss the fundamentals of Islam. Masʿūdī, a historian, reports 11 A. V. Bawlinson, pp. 46, 47.

13 Islamic Islam, pp. 72-77.
14 The Cultural Heritage of India, Vol. IV, p. 61.
A History of Muslim Philosophy

that when he arrived in India in 302/914 he found a Brahman ruler supremely interested in religious discussions. Whenever this ruler heard of a Muslim arriving in his territory he would invite him and entered into religious discussion with him.¹³

From the First/Seventh Century to Śaṅkara.—Inter-communciation of such an active nature could not but influence the thoughts and beliefs of both the communities. Indian philosophy would have been substantially different from what it is today, had Islam with its "militant democracy," "liberal rationalism," and "uncompromising monotheism" not entered the arena of Indian thought. There would have been, in all probability, no proofs for the existence of God such as we find in Udayana's Kāmaśāsā in the fourth/ninth century, nor would there have been Śaṅkara about whose Urmayya Kāhir observes, "Historical factors do not exclude the possibility of Śaṅkara's acquaintance with the elements of Islamic thought."¹⁴ It is necessary to repeat that most of the elements in the southern school of devotion and philosophy taken singly were derived from ancient systems, but the elements in their totality and in their peculiar emphasis betray a singular approximation to Muslim faith and therefore make the argument for Islamic influence probable.¹⁵ Even today there is a group of Śaṅkara's followers who do not cremate but bury their dead in the Islamic way.

All the Mu'tazāliites, with the solitary exception of al-Jāhī, had discussed philosophy and propounded their theories, before Śaṅkara was born in the last quarter of the second/eighth century. Even al-Jāhī would have died before Śaṅkara, had he not lived up to the age of ninety. The Mu'tazāliites were unitarians per excellence. They would not admit the attribution of eternal qualities to God, for that would mean the existence of other eternals besides the eternal God. Śaṅkara too was an uncompromising monoist, believing God to be one and the only reality, all else being illusion. In the writings of Śaṅkara one finds an increasing emphasis on the unity of God which some people have regarded as an extension of the ancient monotheism of the Upanishads. But this explanation has failed to satisfy a good many Orientalists who find in Śaṅkara's works "something pertaining to the esoteric religions especially."¹⁶ Abu al-Hudhāfi, a prominent Mu'tazāliite, appears to be a precursor of those Hindu monists who maintained that God could be described only in negatives. Abu al-Hudhāfi, however, admitted, quite contrary to his fundamental position, that God is knowing, loving, and powerful. The other Mu'tazāliites were quick to discover the inconsistency and denied, therefore, all positive attributes to the Supreme Reality. In their hands God became unpredictable as well as unknowable, more of an abstract, impersonal, and absolute principle at the back of the universe than a God conceived as a person with whom any contact could be established. They did believe in the possibility of the beatiﬁc vision but strongly repudiated all forms of anthropomorphism.

Influence of Muslim Thought on the East

The majority of the Mu'tazāliites were atomists. The universe, they thought, was composed of atoms which were indivisible entities. They divided the physical world into substance and accidents or atoms and bodies. Strict determination, according to them, governed physical phenomena, while freedom of action characterized human beings.

As we have shown in previous chapters, the Mu'tazāliites believed in the cult of reason and endeavored to reconcile the doctrines of Islam with rationalistic views then prevalent. Quite a good many of them enjoyed State patronage. Baghdad, the son of Mu'samarn, was a favourite of the Caliph al-Māmūn during whose reign efforts were made to understand Hindu thought and culture through discussions and translations of religious literature. In theological and philosophical discussions, the protagonists of different views had complete freedom to express themselves. It is not unlikely that in this free exchange of ideas the Hindu participants returned to their homeland with quite a number of rationalistic doctrines having their origin in the Mu'tazāli mode of thought. Communication is rarely one-sided; in free and frank exchange of ideas the traffic is more often than not two-sided. The Mu'tazāliites could not satisfy the masses because of their exclusive concern with reason and their seemingly unorthodox views. The Ash'arites protested against the religious rationalism of the Mu'tazāliites and advocated a middle path between philosophy and orthodoxy. They refuted the Mu'tazāliite views, even while they modified the orthodox doctrine. They rejected the Greek and Oriental philosophers, propounded Islamic doctrines by the dialectical method, and refuted not only Islamic religions as well as some sects of Islam. Al-Aṣḥā'b, al-Baqillānī, al-Jawwānī, al-Ghazzālī, Fakhr al-Dīn al-Rāzī, and Ibn Taimīyah wrote in defence of Islamic theology and in refutation of Greek and particularly Aristotelian thought. Al-Aṣḥā'ī was born in c. 260/873, while al-Ghazzālī, in whose hands the Ash'arite theology reached its final triumph, was born in 450/1056. Al-Ghazzālī was convinced that the philosophical theory could not form the basis of religious thought and that it was by revelation alone that the essentials of religion could be known. Al-Ghazzālī asserted that revelation was quite enough and that its ultimate truth could be ascertained only by the experience of the individual. Through ecstasy one could become a knower and receive, so to say, direct communication from God.

In addition to the Mu'tazāliites, the Ash'arites, and al-Ghazzālī who touched almost on all problems of philosophical and religious interest and whose theories found a way to the Indian soil through various channels some of which we have mentioned above, there was a long, unbroken line of Sufis, beginning with the early Companions of the Prophet who, like the Prophet himself, set a model for the Sufis by their intense zeal and enthusiasm for the cause of Islam, by their piety, and by the austere life they led. The Sufis,
A History of Muslim Philosophy
among whom may be counted Ibrāhīm bin Asdām (d. 160/773), Ibrāhīm bin `Uṯmān (d. 185/900), Rābi‘a‘ bin `Abd ar-Rahmān (d. 185/900), were orthodox Muslims with no pantheistic bias; they revealed, however, in self-abandonment, fervent piety, and quietism, carried to the extreme. Rābi‘a‘ conceived of prayer as a free and intimate intercourse with God. Her prayers indicate spontaneous outpouring of her heart to God. Says she, in one of her prayers, "O my Lord, if I worship Thee from fear of hell, burn me in hell, and if I worship Thee from hope of paradise, exclude me thence, but if I worship Thee for Thine own sake, then withhold not from me Thine Eternal Beauty."

From Sufism to Rāmānuja.—By the time of Rāmānuja, who was born in 407/1016, a host of Muslim thinkers and Sufis—some of the best philosophers that Islam has ever produced—had expounded and elaborated their thoughts in fine systems. It is very unlikely that their thoughts and theories should have failed to influence Indian thought through religious discussions and philosophical disputations which, as we have seen, took place on a wide scale both on the Indian soil and in the Courts of the Caliphs. Evidence is not wanting to show that some of the controversies which figured so prominently in Indian philosophy, after Islam had firmly entrenched itself on the Indian soil, were nothing more than echoes of Muslim thought, in some cases well in others more faintly expressed.

Sufism now entered a new phase of its development. Asceticism still remained important but it was subordinated to theosophical and gnostic speculations. This position is discernible in the sayings of Mārif al-Khāja (d. 200/815), Abu Sulayman al-Ma‘rīn (d. 256/870), and Dhu al-Nūn Mūrī. According to Nizār ibn Bāqir, Dhu al-Nūn is the source of Neo-Platonic elements in Islamic thought. Abu Yazīd al-Bīrūnī (d. 260/874) was the first Sufi to propose the doctrine of fana‘, and in his teaching Sufism became practically identified with pantheism. Ḥasan bin Maṣūr, commonly known as al-Balā‘ī (d. 244/857), was famous for his saying, "I am the Truth," had travelled in East Iran, Gujarat (India), and Central Asia. He maintained that the soul which is immaterial and immortal suffers from its alignment with the body, that the Supreme Being is incomprehensible by the human intellect and imagination, and that union with the Ultimate Reality is possible through suffering. Maṣūr was not appreciated by his contemporaries owing to some of his unorthodox utterances as a result of which he was executed. It was al-Balā‘ī, however, who won recognition for Sufism in Islam.

Apart from the fact that Sufi doctrines and practices must have found their way to India along with other ideas of Muslim origin, there is irrefutable historical evidence to show that Muslim Sufis came in the wake of Muslim conquerors and traders and attracted the people of India by the purity and sublimity of their lives. They transmitted, by their personal contacts and discussions, their whole ideology and the way of life as understood by them and their counterparts in other parts of the Muslim world. Ibn Ḥajar ‘Aṣqalānī mentions in his al-Iṣbā‘ fi Tawāqūt al-Ṣaḥābā that certain Bābā Rattan who accepted Islam and visited Mecca twice. He was perhaps the earliest Indian Sufi. A little later came 'Abd Allah known as Bābā Ḍākī, who died in 1019/719 and was buried in Fāḳhūn cemetery at Lahore. Another saint was Sayyid Shīh Ma‘ṣūd Bhai Mīrān who, in 425/1035, met a martyr’s death at the age of nineteen and was buried in Bahrācī in the United Provinces. In the same century there came to India another saint of very great eminence and of far greater historical significance than any of his predecessors. He was 'Ali al-Hujwīrī, popularly known as Dāī Gānj Bādshah, the writer of the well-known work, Kāfī al-Mulḥah. Amongst the Muslim thinkers who flourished between the second/eighth and fifth/eighth centuries may be mentioned al-Kindī (c. 185/820–826/873), the first philosopher of the Arabs, more renowned as a mathematician and astrologer; al-Fārābī (258/870–339/950), who adopted the Neo-Platonic doctrine of emanation; al-Rāzī (255/860–321/930), the celebrated Muslim physician, physicist, chemist, and philosopher; Muḥammad ibn ibn Sīnā (370/980–428/1027), the representative of pure Aristotelianism.

Influence of Muslim Thought on the East

The philosophical thought that had developed from al-Kindī to Ibn Sīnā, that is, from Rāmānuja’s time, was transplanted in India by the early Muslims, who, in the opinion of Tara Chand, "were men of high rank... who lived and laboured in India, and through their personal contact and influence spread the ideas of Islamic philosophy and mysticism through the length and breadth of India." As a result of this impact, theology became pronounced in Indian philosophy; one comes across proofs for the existence of God for the first time in Uda-yana’s Kauśāyana. The Kauśāyana or the Hindu proof of the existence of God was written in the fourth/fourteenth century.23

Keith says, "To Udayana doubtless belongs the credit of making them a principal tenet of the school, though we have no reason to suppose him the inventor of the doctrine."24 The same is true of the Fāṭeṣkūsha. Radha-krishna observes, "The Fāṭeṣkūsha has been regarded as non-theistic. Kaṅka... the author of the Fāṭeṣkūsha... does not mention God, but later commentators felt that the immutable atoms could not by themselves produce an ordered universe unless a presiding God regulated their activities. The authorship of the Vedas and the convention of the meaning of words require us to postulate a prime mover. The world cannot be explained by the activities of the atoms alone or by the operation of karma. The system, therefore, adopts the view of God which is found in Nyāya."25

In Indian philosophy the Nyāya and the Fāṭeṣkūsha are generally treated together, but these systems in fact never formed a single unitary doctrine

23 Ibid, p. 48.
25 A. R. Keight, Indian Logic and Atomism, Oxford, 1921, p. 32.
A History of Muslim Philosophy

before the middle of the third/ninth century, Keith puts the date of the syncretism of these two systems in the year 285/898 when Vācaśapti composed his Nyāyaśāstra-budhisūtra. A clear exposition of the combined documents, however, is to be found in Uddāna: "whose date, after many variations of opinion, is definitely fixed at 374/984 by his own statement in the Lokāyāstikā. ... Much more famous is his Kṛṣṇa-nidāna which is the classic exposition of the proof of God."*4

It is worth remembering that the Nyāya and the Vādaśāstra were combined to form a single system, after Islam had penetrated deep into the Indian sub-continent. Both the systems were atheistic and atomistic to begin with, but later they took a theistic turn as a result of Muslim influence.

From Rāmānuja up to Date. — Rāmānuja (b. 407/1016), a Hindu philosopher of southern India, advocated the worship of God with devotion and faith. He recognized love as the guiding principle for the relation not only between man and God but also between man and man. Consequently all man-made barriers including those of caste were to be discarded and the doors of religion open to all, irrespective of social position arising from caste or or colour. Rāmānuja admitted Śūras to temples, emphasized self-surrender (puṇḍrata), and adoration of the guru (guru bhakti). His emphasis on self surrender and love of the guru can be traced to Buddhism and Upāsanā but his acceptance of monism and the stress he laid upon it was entirely due to the inspiration he received from the new faith which was then being preached to the people by Muslim saints like Nāṣin Ullah, or the creation of whose mosques land was granted by the Hindu king Kāpur Hērya.*5

While not denying the influence of Buddhism and Upāsanā in the philosophy of Rāmānuja, it can be maintained that Islam could have supplied to the Bhakti leader both the idea of submission to the will of God and that of adoration of the spiritual guide. As for adoration of the guru, Rāmānuja could have got the clue from the writings of the Sufis and also from his personal contacts with them. The objective of bhakti, according to Rāmānuja, is not the realization of nirvāna, but eternal blissfulness in the presence of God—a Sufic belief and not a Buddhist view. His recommendation of a casteless society in which Śūras should suffer no indignity because of their birth and his throwing the doors of temples open to the low-caste are a clear evidence of profiting by Muslim religion and Muslim practices.

In the sixteenth/seventeenth century there were two sects in the South which clearly revealed the influence of Islam. They were the Lingāyats and the Śiddhārhas. The Lingāyats worshipped one God, who, according to them, reveals Himself, as the world-teacher (Aśṭākham Prabhā). The leader of the movement, Basava, was regarded as an incarnation of Śiva, an Aśṭākham Prabhā, whose divinity passed on to his successors and representatives. As

* Keith, op. cit., p. 29.
* Ibid., p. 31.
* T. B. P. Chand, op. cit., p. 112.

Influence of Muslim Thought on the East

love was considered to be the first creation of God, bhakti or devotion was taken to be the ideal of life. This ideal was attainable through treading a path of austerity, renunciation, and concentration on God. The Lingāyats made no sacrifices, kept no fasts, did not go on pilgrimages, and discarded purification ceremonies. There was no caste and no difference based on birth or sex. Marriage was voluntary, widows were permitted to remarry, the dead were buried, and the doctrine of transmigration of the soul was not believed in.

Śiddhārhas, a group of philosophical yogists, were more uncompromising in their monolithic beliefs than the Lingāyats. They rejected the authority of the Vedas and Śāstras and also the theory of metempsychosis. Like the Sufis, they described the Ultimate Reality as Light and conceived of the end of life to be an absorption in God. The Śiddhārhas were also alchemists, and followed Dhu al-Nūn Mīrī in this respect.*6

The religious reform movement started in the South spread to the North from the eighth/fortieth century onward. The Muslim conquest of Northern India by the end of seventh/thirteenth century ushered in an era of unpre cedented revolution in traditional Hindu thought. From the eighth/fortieth century onward, we find the religious leaders of the North rejecting certain elements of the ancient creed and exhibiting a strong tendency to imbibe new ideas and theories. Indian architectural designs show a borrowing of certain features from the Arab and Persian styles of architecture; Indian paintings are influenced by the Central Asian and Persian techniques; in Indian literature a common medium arises in the form of Urdu, while Indian technical and scientific disciplines give evidence of a considerable use of termology and information contained in Muslim works.

In the realm of thought the same phenomenon is evident. Rāmānanda, who flourished in the first half of the ninth/eleventh century, is by many regarded as a bridge between the Bhakti movement of the South and that of the North. He travelled far and wide in search of knowledge and had teachers from the various sects of Hinduism, but his soul remained discon tented till he came in contact with Muslims in Benares.*7 Followers of all religions were welcome to his creed. He admitted to his sect disciples from both sexes.

From the teachings of Rāmānanda arose two schools, one represented by Tuladās and the other by Kabir, the former being conservative and the latter radical, but each was concerned in its own way with the evolution of a religion acceptable to the Hindus and Muslims alike. Both lay stress upon devotion; condemned externals of religion, rituals, and ceremonies; protested against dogma and authority; and maintained that "the divine disclosed it self in the human race as a whole."*8 Kabir was introduced to Hindu philo sophy and religion by Rāmānanda, but he spent a considerable part of his

* Ibid.
Influence of Muslim Thought on the East

suffer through repeated births in lower forms, he threatens them with dire punishments as described in the Qur'an in the parable of hell.

Guru Nanak's debt to Islam was so great and his teachings so well steeped in Sufi lore that, according to Tara Chand, "the fact of the matter is that it is much better to find how much exactly he drew from the Hindu scriptures. His rare references to them lead one to imagine that Nanak was only superficially acquainted with the Vedas and the Puranic literature."24 In his insistence on the unity and brotherhood of mankind and in his condemnation of idol-worship, caste distinctions, and ritualism, Guru Nanak was as good a Muslim as any other Muslim. It is a pity that the later Gurus were drawn into a whirlpool of politics as a result of which a peace-loving Church was converted into a militant society.

Kabir, Tulsi Daya, and Guru Nanak were followed by a host of Hindu thinkers and reformers in the tenth/sixteenth and eleventh/seventeenth centuries who promoted and furthered what in essence were the fundamental principles of Islam. Tulasiraman, a Marathi saint, conceived of God on lines identical with those of Kabir, rejected Vedas sacrificial, idol-worship, and caste,25 while Chaitanya, a Brahman by caste, loved the Hindus so much that he had several Muslim disciples. Chaitanya preached the unity of God, insisted on love and devotion, song and dance and ecstatic trances for union with God.26 It can be easily seen that Chaitanya's teachings bore a close resemblance to those of the Sufis.

Coming to modern times, we notice two important movements of the Arya Samaj and the Brahma Samaj. The former, despite its opposition to Islam, preaches what in reality is the essence of Islam. Swami Dayananand (fide his Subrahmanyan Chaturvedi), the founder of the Arya Samaj movement, denounced idol-worship and ritualism as a corruption of the pure Hindu religion. He also condemned hereditary caste-system and instead favored functional castes. What is remarkable about him is that he indefatigably preached the doctrine of monotheism which in his opinion could be derived from the Vedas and other sacred books of the Hindus. That monotheism is deducible from the Vedas, he may be true. It does not, however, contradict Islam; rather it ratifies the basic standpoint of Islam that God has been revealing Himself to different nations. Hence if monotheism is found in the Vedas, it would not be surprising to a Muslim. What is, however, surprising is Swami Dayananand's emphasis on this doctrine which is lacking in the pre-Islamic literature of India. The Brahma-Samajists have discarded the theory of rebirths. They are also opposed to ritualism, image-worship, and caste-system.

In addition to these two movements in modern Hinduism, there is the Rama-Krishna religious reconstruction movement and the Theosophical

---

24 Tara Chand, op. cit., p. 177.
25 Fraser and Marathi, hymns of Tulasi Ram.
26 Jdunath Sarkar, Chaitanya.
Society following a religious and social programme; each of these bears close resemblance to Muslim faith and practice.

From India Islam goes to Indonesia.

INDONESIA

Before the advent of Islam, the Indonesian Archipelago, the biggest country after China in the Far East and the seventh among the great countries of the world, was ruled over for about a thousand years by the Hindus, who went there as traders in the first or second century A.D. and eventually became rulers through their effective diplomacy and practical common sense. According to Pandit Jawahar Lal Nehru, the first Hindu immigrants to Indonesia belonged to Southern India. Being traders they settled on coasts and traded with different lands in sundry articles of daily use. They also brought with them their religion which, because of its superiority, could not fail to influence the natives. There is, however, no historical evidence to show whether it was Buddhism or Hinduism that first came to Indonesia. The Hindus never cultivated the art of history in the early centuries, nor did they devise canons for sifting recorded or oral evidence, with the result that their early history is nothing but a mass of fairy tales founded upon imagination, make-believe, or hearsay with no solid rock of facts to stand upon. The early Hindu settlers in Indonesia have left no record of theirs; consequently, it is difficult to determine the chronological order of Hindu cults and beliefs as they found their way into this new land. It is, however, conjectured that the form of Buddhism first to enter the Archipelago was Hinayana and that after a considerable period of time the other form of Buddhism, Mahayana, was also introduced. In the Majapahit period when Hindu culture and Hindu domination were at their highest a new religion arose, which was the result of the fusion of Brahmanism and Buddhism, incorporating in itself some strands of indigenous thoughts and feelings.

In spite of the political and commercial domination of the Hindus, the country as a whole was never converted to Hinduism. In Java, Hinduism had its strongest centre, while Buddhism had the greatest number of its adherents in Sumatra, Malaya, and a few other adjoining and adjacent islands. A large part of the Archipelago, however, remained untouched by Hinduism and continued to revel in idolatry and nature-worship. In a large majority of the islands, life went on as usual—the same round of festivals, customary observances, and rituals, showing no sign of foreign influence or changed socio-political conditions. Life in these areas was hemmed in by countless superstitions and irrational fears—the products of ignorance and idol-worship. Multiplicity of superstitions led to the creation of innumerable deities, each deity being held responsible for a particular phase of human life or nature. Homage was paid to gods and goddesses out of fear, for their displeasure could bring about disaster, infertility, epidemics, floods, death, and what not. Consequently, an elaborate ritual, performed meticuulously, was required to keep the deities on the right side. Often the ritual was so complicated that a specially trained agency was called for to perform it strictly in accordance with set practices and established laws. There arose thus a priestly class whose function it was to help invoke the sympathy of gods and goddesses through incantations, charms, sacrifices, and offerings—all of these practised and performed in a characteristic manner and style.

Wherever Hinduism was in ascendancy the Brahmanas assumed the function of priests and arrogated to themselves the power which none else but a person endowed with supernatural powers could have. The priestly class came to wield, in course of time, not only spiritual but also temporal power through their association with Courts and princes, for the kings needed divine help as much as ordinary mortals. Anxious to keep their power intact, the priests transmitted their knowledge only to their kith and kin. Very often the recipient of the information was the son of the priest who was initiated into the art of performing ceremonies and trained in them with the utmost exactitude and care, for a slight error or omission would bring about the wrath of a god instead of pleasing him. Thus, the priestly class became hereditary, enjoying special privileges and prerogatives. The society was split up into two classes, with the priestly class at the top, dominating and exploiting the other by its cleverness, sophistry, and chicanery. Because of his colossal ignorance, political servitude, and economic insufficiency, the common man contented himself with the life and fortunes of a serf or an underling.

Hinduism accentuated the prejudice of class distinction; it gave a fillip to idol-worship; it augmented rather than diminished the number of deities; and above all it introduced ashes, a life-negating ethic and a life-reconciling philosophy. The natural outcome of this attitude was extension in the field of superstition, an acute sense of individual and collective insecurity together with moral and spiritual bankruptcy on a wide scale.

Islam entered the arena when Hinduism was at the zenith of its glory. The latter was armed with the might of political domination; it had its missionaries all over the Archipelago, who had converted thousands of the natives to their faith; and it had firmly entrenched itself on the soil by its cultural superiority, commercial leadership, and marital relationships. Islam had to fight against heavy odds. There was no political power to launch a campaign against the Indonesian Hindu rulers. In the middle of the seventh/thirteenth century when Islam got a foothold in Sumatra, the Muslims all over the world had fallen on evil days. The Fijinisids who ruled over the Arab countries, Egypt, and Africa were in a process of disintegration; the `Abbasids were on their last legs; Persia was the vantage ground for self-106 Glories of World History, p. 133.

---

A History of Muslim Philosophy

interested upstarts; while Spain, once the pride of Muslim culture and philosophy, had forgotten its traditions and was in the throes of death, surrounded as it was by the Christian hordes who were bent upon giving it a short shift.
In India the Slave dynasty was replaced by the Khaljis, who were busy at that time setting their own house in order and had little time to look to other peoples’ affairs. It is evident that under these circumstances no Muslim power was in a position to lend a helping hand to any campaign, much less to one which had no connection with territorial aggrandisement or imperialistic expansionist programme.

On the Indonesian soil no gun was fired, nor any sword drawn for the propagation of Islam. Arnold says, "The history of the Malay Archipelago during the last six hundred years furnishes us with one of the most interesting chapters in the story of the spread of Islam by missionary efforts. . . . In every instance, in the beginning, their work had to be carried on without any patronage or assistance from the rulers of the country, but solely by the force of persuasion, and in many cases in the face of severe opposition, especially on the part of the Spaniards."29

Several causes have been listed by historians for the slow and spontaneous spread of Islam throughout Indonesia, but it must be admitted that there is yet no established theory to account for this remarkable phenomenon—unique in the annals of history for its methodology and success.

A common explanation for the religious conquest of Indonesia by Islam is offered in terms of the commercial relations which the Muslim merchants from India established in the middle of the seventh/thirteenth century with the Indonesians. These merchants, it is said, married Indonesian women and secured thereby a respectable position for themselves. In course of time the Indonesian wives together with the slaves of their household furnished a nucleus for the acceptance and spread of Islam.

A little reflection will, however, show that this explanation is no better than a myth and needs to be examined in the light of truth. Before exhibiting the hollowness of the explanation, it is interesting to note that even so great an authority as Arnold30 seems to subscribe to it. He quotes approvingly from Pedro Geynau who says, "The better to introduce their religion into the country, the Mohammedans adopted the language and many of the customs of the natives, married their women, purchased slaves in order to increase their personal importance, and succeeded finally in incorporating themselves among the chiefs who held the foremost rank in the state. Since they worked together with greater ability and harmony than the natives, they gradually increased their power more and more, as having numbers of slaves in their possession, they formed a kind of confederacy among themselves and established a sort of monarchy, which they made hereditary in one family.

29 Arnold, op. cit., p. 362.
30 Ibid., p. 365.
31 Ibid., pp. 365-96.
32 Aspects of Islam in Post-Colonial Indonesia, p. 35.
33 "Indonesian Trade and Society," Essays in Asian Social and Economic History,

1408

Influence of Muslim Thought on the East

Though such a confederacy gave them great power, yet they felt the necessity of keeping on friendly terms with the old aristocracy, and of ensuring their freedom to those classes whose support they could not afford to dispense with." To this quotation Arnold adds, "It must have been in some such way as this that the different Muhammadan settlements in the Malay Archipelago laid a firm political and social basis for their proselytising efforts. They did not come as conquerors, like the Spanish in the sixteenth century, or use the sword as an instrument of conversion; nor did they arrogate to themselves the privileges of a superior and dominant race so as to degrade and oppress the original inhabitants, but coming simply in the guise of traders they employed all their superior intelligence and civilisation in the service of their religion." 29

This explanation along social lines founded on respect and prosperity is invalidated, according to C. A. O. van Nieuwenhuijze, by the fact "that the type of trade which the foreign Muslims conducted was by no means alien or new to the Indonesian society." 30 The same point of view is presented with much rigour and empirical data by Comp. J. C. van Leur31 to whom the inquisitive reader may turn for further elaboration and clarification.

The object of the refutation is not to deny the role of the early Muslim traders in the dissemination of Islamic beliefs and practices; it is rather to assign to them a proper place in the situation which was extremely complex and comprised far more potent factors than trade and marital relationships. The traders were no better than carriers of a culture or a world-view which could not have gained ground in spite of their zeal and fervour, had it not the strength to stand on its own legs.

Another explanation for the peaceful penetration of Islam into Indonesia is to be found in the socio-political conditions of the urban society which was powerfully influenced by the caste-system that had been introduced by Hindusism. Priesthood had divided the society into two watertight compartments. This and like differences were supported, and in a way accentuated by the caste-system which the Hindus had brought with them and introduced.
Hindusism not only ratiﬁed bifurcation in the Indonesian society, it also mutilated the then existing divisions, for Hinduism admits of four classes and not only two in society. These divisions based originally on professions became hereditary so that no person, however talented he might be, could change his caste. A person born in a Śāṅdra home could not make a visible step to the social stigma attached to him for having been born in a low-caste home.
Intelligence, integrity, talent, and hard work were of no avail in face of the inflexibility of the caste-system. The worst to suffer in this system were those who stood at the lowest rungs; they were the most oppressed and the most

1409
A History of Muslim Philosophy

exploited, but the others too with the exception of the priestly and the Brahmanical class had to suffer different kinds of social indignities and disabilities.

The non-priestly classes, particularly the lower ones, found in Islam a panacea to the ills which like a misma were eating up the very fabric of the society. Since Islam recognises no distinctions which divide man from man and recommends a classless and casteless society, it captured the imagination of the Indonesians, who embraced the new religion to reassert their dignity as human beings and to re-acquire democratic rights to live as free individuals unleashed by artificial man-made restrictions. The conception of the universal brotherhood of mankind together with the basic equality of all human beings, which Islam advocates so vehemently, proved a dynamite for the foundations of the social structure of Hinduism. Accordingly, Hinduism crumbled like a house of cards and the Indonesian masses, particularly those living in the urban areas, accepted the new faith in large numbers. From the harbour towns and coastal areas, where the grip of the caste-system was the strongest and the most pinching, Islam spread inland.

Another reason for the success of Islam is to be discovered in the simplicity of the creed that it preaches. It makes no metaphysical prepositions as it does, for instance, by Buddhism, nor does it demand credence in too many transcendental beings as is the case with Hinduism. Islam is unencumbered by theological subtleties. It simply asserts the godhead of one God and the prophethood of Muhammad and that of others. The fundamental tenets of Islam are, thus, the fundamental demands of the human intellect. Professor Montef says, 'Islam is a religion that is essentially rationalistic in the widest sense of this term considered etymologically and historically. . . . This fidelity to the fundamental dogma of the religion, the elemental simplicity of the formulas in which it is enunciated. . . . are so many causes to explain the success of the Indonesian missionary efforts. A creed so precise, so stripped of all theological complexities and consequently so accessible to the ordinary understanding, might be expected to possess and does indeed possess a marvellous power of winning its way into the consciences of men.'44

Hinduism never accorded with the genius of the Indonesians in spite of the Hindu's long cultural contact with them and their equally long political domination. The average Hindu Indonesian wore his creed like a veneer which left his soul as well as his body almost naked. He yearned for a creed more in line with his natural cravings and intellectual demands. When Islam presented itself as a rival to Hinduism and heathenism, it quickly acquired victory by the force of its logic and the rationality of its demands.

Another factor which may have contributed to the success of Islam is its theory of human society which release men from his narrow geographical grooves and makes him a member of the community (munash) of Islam. National loyalties and political affiliations are subordinated to the larger interests of the Muslim community as a whole. Not only does this conception emancipate an individual from the prison of self-interest and parochialism, it also provides an anchor-sheet for the forlorn and the neglected. A convert, after having lost his kinship with his clans, can save himself from the pangs of loneliness by conjuring up his association with a bigger whole which recognizes neither territorial limits nor clannish bonds. A thing of this kind is not to be found in other religions, much less in Hinduism, torn as it is by its caste-system, family distinctions, and the practice of untouchability.

1410

Influences of Muslim Thought on the East

Islam has not only the power to attract, but it has still another idea nobler and richer in content for the rehabilitation and re-establishment of the lonely and the forsaken. This idea is to be found in mysticism which promises to place man in the lap of infinity. It is said that in the beginning the Indonesians were attracted by the mysticism of Islam rather than by any of its other aspects.

In addition to the reasons enumerated above, one very potent reason for the propagation and success of Islam in foreign lands, particularly in Indonesia, Malay, Indo-China, and the Philippines Islands, was the enthusiasm and sincerity with which Islam was presented by the early Muslim mystics who migrated to these islands of their own accord and settled there temporarily or permanently. Generally, they accompanied the Muslim traders or came in their wake. The first thing they did was to acquaint themselves with the local dialect; this was necessary for transmission and exchange of ideas.

After acquiring proficiency in the native language, the Sufis started propagating Islam among the influential and the rich, believing that reform of these would rid the society of most of the ills from which it suffered, and that their conversion would be followed by those of the masses. The unlettered and the unsophisticated people which formed the bulk of the society looked up to their chiefs and nobles for guidance and inspiration. Not able to make a decision themselves, they imitated the high-ups in all matters. Hence the success of a religious ideology among the upper classes, the Sufis thought, would work for the spiritual regeneration.

The Sufis built mosques which often had schools attached to them. From these centres of learning were delivered courses of lectures on Muslim theology, culture, philosophy, and history. Mysticism has a philosophy of a very high order. It replaces the cold formalism of the Skeni by an intense and passionate longing for the all-loving God and ensures the purification of the heart by treading a well-regulated Path. The Sufis regarded prayers, fasting, and pilgrimages as means and not ends to be cultivated and pursued for their own sake. But they knew that the means were as much necessary for the spiritual uplift of a person as the attainment of the end. And, therefore, the early mystics who took upon themselves the burden of carrying the message of God to the four corners of the world stressed the performance of religious duties, such as offering prayers, fasting, going on a pilgrimage, etc., along with acts of supererogation for winning the pleasure of God.
A History of Muslim Philosophy

A brief historical sketch of the growth and development of mysticism in Islam has been provided in an earlier chapter and, therefore, need not be repeated here. Suffice it to say that by the end of the seventh/thirteenth century when Islam was imported into Indonesia and other adjacent islands, the theory of mysticism had received its final touches at the hands of the leading Muslim thinkers and divines. According to a number of Orientalists, the best of Muslim religion is to be found in its mysticism.

Ma'lima Burhan al-Din is said to have been the first Muslim to preach his faith to the islanders. He belonged to the Qadiriyyah order of Sufism which is named after 'Abd al-Qadir al-Jilani (470/1077-560/1166), a saint, whose writings, generally orthodox in content, have a tendency to mystical interpretation of the Qur'an. The Ma'lima also belonged to the Shafi'iyyah sect—one of the four legal schools of Muslim theology named after Imam al-Shafi'i who effected a synthesis of the strict adherence to Tradition of the Malikis with the Hanafi method of qiyas, that is to say, with the analogical deduction. Abu Hanifa, the founder of the Hanafi legal school, made free use of his own judgment in deciding between traditions, while Malik ibn Anas maintained the exclusive validity of the accepted traditions. Al-Shafi'i carved a via media between these two modes of approach and attempted a synthesis.

Ma'lima Burhan al-Din was, thus, steeped in the best traditions of Islam. He followed the Shafi'i and was affiliated to the most tolerant and progressive school of Sufism, a school which was neither too liberal nor yet too conservative.

The Muslims of the Archipelago at present belong predominantly to the Shafi'iyyah sect and this is due to the teachings of the Ma'lima.

It is interesting to note that the Shafi'iyyah sect was predominant on the Coromandel and the Malabar Coasts of India when the Muslim traders from these areas first landed in Sumatra and introduced their culture and religion. It may be conjectured in the absence of any historical record that these Muslims belonged to India and traveled with or came in the wake of the Indian Muslim traders who also belonged mostly to the Shafi'iyyah sect as well as to the Qadiriyyah school of mysticism.

Among the Muslim rulers of Sumatra, Sulaiman Ahmad worked ceaselessly for the glory of Islam. During his reign as well as during that of his descendants Muslim missionaries were sent far and wide. Wherever they went, they built mosques and schools to provide permanent centres of devotion and learning. The schools also served as community centres where matters of common interest were discussed. The King al-Malik al-Zahtar, a descendant of Sulaiman Ahmad, was fond of holding discussions with theologians, and his Court was thronged with men of learning and letters. We have it on the authority of ibn Battutah that the king had summoned two jurists and a scholar from Persia for discussion and clarification of some religious-legal issues.

Next to come under the influence of Islam was the Moluccas. There is no

Influence of Muslim Thought on the East

knowing of the fact how the new religion was introduced, but this much can be inferred from the present cultural condition of the islands that there existed strong traces of Indian and Arabian influence in the life and literature of the inhabitants. Their religion is predominantly Shafi'iyyah, but their culture is steeped in Arabian lore and learning. The Muslim kings of the Moluccas rendered yeanman's service to the cause of Islam by instituting centres of Muslim culture, literature, history, and philosophy. During the reign of Mansur, the Malay language adopted the Arabic script. Ancient Indian Muslim literature was transliterated into Malay Arabic script. Mansur also introduced Islamic constitution in the country, though not completely, for he kept intact the old system of taxation, general administration, and fishing; yet in all other matters he made an attempt to follow the Shafi'iyyah jurisprudence, social polity, and details of administration.

Islam spread to Java through the efforts of the trading mystics of Malay, particularly of Maulana Malik Ibnbrahim, an Indian national of Gajerai district.

The Ma'lima was not only a Suli of high order but also a scholar of the first rank and a Hakim of no mean repute. He cured a Hindu dignitary who subsequently embraced Islam and is counted among the nine saints of Java.

He is known as Raden Rahmat. The other saints belonged either to the rich Hindu families or to the defunct Majapahit dynasty. All of them without exception led a life of simplicity, piety, and high religious fervour. They converted thousands to Islam by their example and teaching. A mosque was built where the nine saints met occasionally to discuss matters of common interest. The converts also congregated there to discuss their problems and difficulties. Deputations from foreign lands were also received in this mosque. This shows that the mosque was not only a centre of devotion but also a community centre dedicated to multipurpose activities. So great was the religious ardour that the Muslim converts of Java entertained a keen desire to visit the holy places of Islam; one of them, Sunan Gunung, by name, went for pilgrimage to Mecca where he learnt the principles of Islam from Arab teachers, and came back to Java full of enthusiasm for the new faith.

It will take several pages to recount the story of the spread of Islam in other islands of Indonesia. Suffice it to say that its propagation was nothing but a peaceful penetration through the efforts of traders, mystics, and preachers—both native and foreign.

Before the advent of Islam, Java had been ruled by Majapahit, a Hindu dynasty, which had fallen on evil days; as a result, the country had become divided into a number of principalities, each owing allegiance to its own chieftain. The people followed either Hinduism or Buddhism, but very often their religion was an amalgam of both with a strong overtones of animism and belief in magic and sorcery. The condition of other islands was no better. The 43 Detailed information on this subject is to be found in Arnold's Preaching of Islam and Crawford's History of the Indian Archipelago, Edinburgh, 1820.

Influence of Muslim Thought on the East

economics, emphasis was now laid upon effort, struggle, and achievement. Renunciation was eschewed in favor of community living, and a casteless society was preached for in place of a caste-ridden one. Spiritual values were extolled as against the commercial ones. All this led to a great awakening among the masses. The Indonesians realized as never before that they were connected with one another by ties which transcended caste, creed, and colour.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

General

Encyclopedia of Islam; Encyclopaedia of Religion and Ethics; A. M. A. Shanti, Outline of Islamic Culture; 3 Vols; Khalifa Abdal Hakim, Islamic Ideology; M. M. Shaid, Muslim Thought: Its Origins and Achievements; V. V. Bartold, Moslem Culture.

Persia, Turkey, Afghanistan, and China

India

E. C. Dewick and Murray T. Titus, Indian Islam; Tara Chand, Influence of Islam on Indian Culture; Sir Walter Gifford, The Cambridge History of India; E. K. A. Jayawardena, South India and Her Mediterranean Friends; Ramnarayan; J. B. Bhattacharya, The Vasamukhi Reform in India; E. C. Buchan, Ahmad's India; J. T. Reland, Relation de voyage faite par les Arabes et Persans; T. W. Arnold, The Preaching of Islam; S. M. Bhattacharya, Maqdisi al-Din; H. H. Kabeer, The Turks in India; Naim al-Din Ali, Muhammad al-Mustafa; N. D. Dukker, The Cult of the Sufis; R. A. Nicolau, The Mystics of Islam; B. E. M. Al-Sayyid, The Sufis; Khairat Singh, History and Philosophy of the Sufis; Sardul Singh, The Story of the Sufis; Wilfred Cantwell Smith, Modern Islam in India; Islam in Modern History; Sayyid Sulaiman Nadwi, Arab we Hind se Ta'asalqat.

Indonesia

I. Bruno Latour, Peoples of South-East Asia; G. G. Dobrizhoffer, Peoples of South-East Asia; J. Gidion, Sinhalese in Indonesia; C. A. O. Nieuwenhuis, Aspects of Islam in Past-Colonial Indonesia; H. A. B. Gibb, Outer Islam; J. C. van Leer, Indonesian Trade and Society; William Marden, The History of Sumatra; Marguerite Harmon Bro, Indonesia; Richard Winstedt, Malay, Its History; Kali Das Nag, India and the Pacific World; T. W. Arnold, The
A History of Muslim Philosophy

BOOK SEVEN

The Dark Age

(1111/1700–1266/1850)

Chapter LXX

DECLINE IN THE MUSLIM WORLD

The second decline of the Muslim world, its Dark Age, dates roughly from the beginning of the twelfth/eighteenth century to the middle of the thirteenth/nineteenth century. With the exception of Indonesia where decadence started earlier, all the Muslim countries witnessed a terrible decline not only in their political status but also in their intellectual and cultural life soon after the awakening of Europe from a long slumber, an awakening which was the result of her intellectual, scientific, and philosophical movements. While the Ottomans lost their glory after Sulaiman the Magnificent, the Safawids after Shah Abbas the Great, and the Moguls in India after Aurangzib, the European nations went from strength to strength, acquiring more and more territories and trade centres from the Muslim rulers, defeating them on land and sea, and finally pronouncing the Muslim empire to be suffering from incurable diseases. Several reasons have been assigned to this catastrophe, some of which will be discussed in the course of this chapter. Broadly speaking, the reasons are either political or non-political; hence our discussion of them has been divided into two parts—the first dealing with political causes, and the second with the non-political ones. Since the political causes were a little different in each case, the great Muslim empires of this period have been treated separately. Non-political causes, however, have been discussed together.

A POLITICAL CAUSES OF THE CATASTROPHIC DECLINE

1. Turkey—Sulaiman the Magnificent was the last and the greatest of the first ten Ottoman Sultans who together in a period of three centuries raised Turkey from nothing to one of the most dreaded and powerful empires of the world. But climax is generally followed by decline, so we find signs of decadence appearing in the later part of Sulaiman’s reign. According to